Tasmanian statue could be first example of protest art

A discovery in Tasmania of a historic sculpture may be the country's first example of political - and quite rude - protest art.

Tasmania's Maritime Museum has released images of a 1.3-metre sandstone statue of a well-dressed colonial gentleman, created by a convict in the 1830s.

The statue depicts what researchers say is very probably George Arthur, fourth governor of Van Diemen's Land (as Tasmania was known). His penis protrudes from his button fly and plumbing suggests the artist's brief was to create a urinating fountain.
